Location: Samar Province

First Known Encounter: 1960s

Description: Said to be an invisible mythical city between municipalities Gandara and Pagsanghan. It is described as an ultramodern city of engkantos. The name originates from "Hanapán ng mga nawáwalâ" ("The place where the lost are found") in the local Waray language.

Biringan is described to be a city that rises from the waters to the clouds, a metropolis that can be compared to New York or Hong Kong. The technology of the city is more advanced than ours. There are allegedly seven portals in Samar that lead to the city. One is said to be at the Northwest Samar State University, located near one of the trees.

Rumors about the city started circulating during the 1960s. Many legends have come up from this lost city.

There was allegedly an American shipment of expensive construction materials addressed to an unknown location called Biringan. The deliveries came with specific instructions, one of which was for a truckload of lumber to be driven to a dirt road away from the town and left there. The dumped cargo disappeared the next day.

Another legend from around 1980-1990 was of a Japanese company that was interested in developing Western Samar. The Japanese were said to have a satellite map which showed a glowing spot the size of a city in a forest area in the province. The Japanese believed there were deposits of gold and uranium in that area. Several accidents occurred, and operations were forced to shut down. The company left empty-handed.

A more recent story (date unconfirmed) comes from a local news magazine show from GMA-7 called "Mel & Joey". The two interviewed a professor who was producing a play about the lost city. The production suffered many problems and mishaps, and it could only be staged after making offerings and asking for permission. He mentioned that they had to stop praying before rehearsals and performances because the Biringanons apparently did not like it.

With the rise of the internet, there have been many people claiming to be Biringanons and posting pictures of people with missing philtra, which legend says is how engkantos can be differentiated from humans. It has not been clarified if these images are doctored, however it is quite likely.

Update report.

Someone has uploaded several episodes of the Mel & Joey show. I have briefly skimmed through most of them, but I could not pinpoint the portion about Biringan. It may be lost media. No information on the professor came up in my research.

This story is not a high priority, and the location is not in Luzon, so a request to look into it onsite will most probably be denied or put eternally on hold.
