Location: Guimbal, Iloilo

First Known Encounter: 1950s

Last Update: 2026/03/20

Description: An old, Spanish-era mansion built in the 19th century and owned by a prominent Filipino-Spanish family. The architecture is a blend of Spanish and Filipino styles. There is an acacia tree with a sign that says "The vanishing mansion-sometimes it is a tree, sometimes a mansion."

The national highway near the mansion was narrowed to give way to the spirits in the area. People say that there are many strange occurrences in the vicinity, including disappearing passengers. Along the roads there is a sign that says "Caution: Mari-it" ("enchanted place"). The area is said to be more accident-prone.

The legend spread from taxi drivers, one claiming that a passenger who seemed well off asked to go to Guimbal. When they arrived, he saw the mansion, and upon reaching its gate, he blew his horn and was allowed to enter by the security guard. He drove around it and then was suddenly shocked to see it was gone, replaced with an acacia tree.

According to the locals, the mansion becomes invisible or disappears. Some say it disappears into the morning fog, or it can only be seen at night and disappears come morning. Others say it becomes invisible at certain times of the year. Visitors say that they have heard strange noises and felt a sort of ghostly presence from the attic of the mansion.

Locals say that people who have their third eye opened can see the mansion. Even those who cannot see it respect the belief that it is there.

There is a statue of the lady that was picked up by that taxi driver. She was described as dressed in white and disappeared upon reaching the mansion.

It reminds me of the White Lady. There is an archived file on it that I requested to be put back in our active cases as a supplementary for other cases like this. I wonder what the link is to ghost women dressed in white and being driven to places.

The statue itself and the signs around it were placed there by the then-mayor as a way to preserve the century-old acacia tree and to provide safety for the children from the school across the street. The mayor was using the surfacing legends for this purpose. It's quite admirable, I'd say. Would that have an effect on the spirits of the mansion?
