Location: Quezon City, NCR

First Known Encounter: 1980s

Last Update: 2026/03/20

Description: Sighted at Balete Drive, a two-lane street in New Manila, Quezon City. It was named after the balete tree along the side of the road.

In folklore, balete trees are believed to be homes for spirits and can be gateways to the other world. There are many legends claiming the street to be haunted since the 1950s.

The legend of the White Lady spread in the 1980s. There was a lady dressed in white who would hail a cab in the middle of the night, get in, and disappear. Some versions of this legend had her getting off at an old house and going to get cash to pay the driver. The driver would eventually go and ring the doorbell, to which an old lady answers. When the driver told her about the lady in white, she told him that he had just described her recently deceased daughter.

It is believed that the White Lady was raped and killed by a taxi driver, and her spirit roams Balete Drive in search of her murderer, explaining the choice of victims. However, there are no reports of murder, and the believed story was actually fabricated by a news reporter in 1953.

This report has been in the archive and was merely for documentation purposes. However, there have been many reported sightings of a "white lady" throughout the years, so I felt it was appropriate to bring this up as a reference.

The sightings of a white lady are pretty much the same as any other ghost sighting, but it is interesting to look into how and why this is such a common phenomenon.

This story is similar to the American "vanishing hitchhiker".

The story was expanded on in a nonfiction book by Jan Harold Brunvand in 1981. A distressed lady in white calls over passing drivers and disappears without explanation in the moving vehicle.

According to Wikipedia, the first vanishing hitchhiker legend was probably from Sweden at least 400 years ago. It was written down in a manuscript by a priest named Joen Petri Klint.
